Tips to buying the perfect wine glass

If the last time you went out to buy wine glasses you came home with a five-alarm headache and a bag of plastic tumblers, you, like me, have probably asked yourself: Why, WHY are there so many kinds of wine glasses? Do we really need a different glass for every variety of wine – one for chardonnay, another for pinot noir, one for cabernet, another for sauvignon blanc and on?

AT HOME WITH Marni Jameson

"Holy Haut Medoc!" You think. "I have been doing this wrong all along! And who has that kind of shelf space?"

Recently, when someone presented me with a bottle of cream sherry, and I hadn't the vaguest idea what glass to use, I decided, as I saw my withering wine confidence dribble down the drain, to get to the bottom of this wine barrel. I called Gabe Geller, top sommelier at Royal Wine Corp, a 150-year-old producer, importer and exporter of wines and spirits, based in Bayonne, New Jersey, who agreed to field my cask of questions.

"How many types of wine glasses do I need so I don't seem like a philistine?" I wanted to know. "And what's with all the shapes, anyway?"

"The world of wine glasses can seem intimidating," said Geller. "You can find a different glass for every type of wine. It's a bit of a marketing schtick. Realistically, one good universal wine glass is perfectly suitable for anything, from your summer afternoon white to your complex heavy red."

"Thank you!" I said. Though Geller appreciates the research and testing that go into the different wine-glass shapes, he concedes, only the effete few will notice or care. "And if your friends are judging you by your stemware, you need new friends."
